Middle age technology
in today's kitchen

7342 | Chili Red Ceramic Butter Keeper

Contenedor cerámico de mantequilla

A secret from the middle ages! Before the invention of modern day refrigeration butter was kept fresh by using this simple measure. In the Middle Ages earthenware pots were submersed in water. This method keeps butter fresh and soft ready to be spread on the most delicate of breads. No more ripping each slice apart just to get your butter spread. This design keeps butter at the perfect consistency. The water in the base will create an airtight seal that will preserve the freshness of the butter. This is better than refrigeration because the butter is protected from the air. Best of all your butter is always at room temperature ready to spread. No more waiting for butter to warm up.

Here's How It Works!

Add one inch of cold water into the larger base.

Pack softened butter into the bell shaped cup.

Place the lid upside down into the base filled with water.
